We need to figure out how to extend those same strategies and principles into our middle schools, because, absolutely, when students do not have facility in reading, they are going to have a hard time mastering a 9th grade textbook. We think we can do that. There is some very encouraging work going around the coun-try. In Kansas, Don Deschler is working on how to take these prin-ciples with older learners. We must make sure that our middle school teachers have some capacity and understanding of how to teach reading, if you will. We have expected - and rightly so, obviously - our elementary school teachers to be primarily reading teachers, but we also expect our middle and high school teachers to be content area experts and not reading teachers, and we are going to have to embed some of those skills likewise in the higher grade levels until students get caught up. HAIRMAN The C. Thank you. That has been very helpful. Senator Kennedy. Senator K. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. ENNEDY Part of the concern that I have is whether this program is going to be of general benefit to all children and provide opportunity for all children in terms of the math and science AP program, to move a whole generation of children forward, which I think is the central challenge. Amd President Bushs proposal is sort of against a back-ground where the Administration is cutting back on a...
